VALUABLE WAR RELICS.

Prominent Grand Army Men Collecting Arms and Bibles.

A systematic effort is being made by the veterans of the war at Hartford toward the preservation of authentic relics of the war. There are many curiosities and memorials in individual hands that can be secured and placed in a war museum, to be built there in the future, preserving them thereby for posterity.

The division headquarters flag which belonged to Gen. James Shields, the Irish patriot, being used by him in the Army of the Shenandoah, is now owned by Major E. V. Preston of that city. It fell into the possession of Major Preston during the war and has been preserved by him with great care. He was an aide de camp on the staff of General O. S. Ferry, who was United States senator from Connecticut after the war. General Ferry succeeded General Shields in the service, and the headquarters flag passed into the ownership and control of Major Preston. It is not likely that any of the survivors of General Shields' division are now aware of the existence of their old commander's headquarters colors. They are in a good state of preservation.

The sword that was worn by Captain Charles E. Bulkeley, a Yale graduate of distinction, who lost his life in the service, is now the property of ex-Governor Morgan G. Bulkeley. A sword captured by Captain Bulkeley while he was a private in General Joseph H. Hawley's rifle company in the First Connecticut regiment has descended to Colonel William E. A. Bulkeley, one of Trinity's best known graduates. The sword was captured at Falls Church before the battle of Bull Run.

Lieutenant Samuel H. Thompson, who was engaged to Elizabeth Stuart Phelps at the outbreak of the war, lost his life in a regiment from this state. He made a gallant record at Antietam, and the sword which he wore in that battle was returned to his father, President William Thompson of the Hartford theological seminary. For years President Thompson guarded the weapon as a sacred memorial. It is still among the family heirlooms. The sword and hat of Gen. Nathaniel Lyon, who was killed at Wilson's Creek in 1862, were presented to the state and deposited, by vote of the legislature, in the Connecticut Historical society rooms.

The battle sword of Major Gen. John Sedgwick, who was killed at Spottsylvania May 19, 1864, is also deposited with this historical society.

The swords of Gen. Robert O. Tyler and of Commander George W. Rodgers of the United States navy are guarded by the same society. Commander Rodgers was killed in the attack on Fort Sumter August 17, 1863.

The first naval officer from Connecticut who was killed during the war was Capt. James H. Ward of Hartford. He lost his life at Matanzas Point, Va., June 27, 1861. The coat and hat he wore in the engagement are still preserved. The costly battle sword that was given to Col. Thomas H. Seymour by the state legislature as a testimonial for gallant services in the Mexican war has been placed in Hartford by the sole surviving members of the Seymour family, now living in New Orleans.

There are half a dozen or more weapons in the city that were carried by Revolutionary heroes. Edward I. McClellan of New York city has turned over to Hartford guardianship a pair of pistols that were carried in the Revolution by Gen. Samuel McClellan of Woodstock, who was the great-grandfather of General George B. McClellan.

The battle swords of Gen. Israel Putnam, Gen. Jonathan Trumbull, and Gen. Ichabod Wadsworth are preserved in the Connecticut Historical society.

The sword that belonged to Jonathan Trumbull, Jr., while he was secretary to Washington, has a place by the side of the senior Trumbull's.

The oldest curiosity in the way of swords goes back to the period of the Pequot war. It belonged to Sergt. William Hayden of Windsor. It was used by him in saving the life of Capt. John Mason from an Indian warrior, the savage's bowstring being cut by Hayden as he aimed at Mason.

There are numerous diaries that were kept by the Connecticut soldiers in the civil war which will be of great interest to a generation from now. One of the most important of the series gives the inside history of Andersonville. It is now owned by Capt. Robert H. Kellogg of Cincinnati.

Col. William H. Tubbs of New London, who served in the Fourteenth Connecticut Volunteers, also has a diary of much value, which he kept in the Army of the Potomac.

There is a diary in Yale college that was kept in Andersonville by a private soldier from Hartford, and it gives a full account of the prison life during the summer of 1864.

These relics are of so much interest that the Grand Army has inaugurated the task of collecting and preserving so far as possible whatever may be found and secured.

INDIVIDUAL COMMUNION CUPS.

For Howard Avenue Congregational Church—Other Notes.

Eight persons united with the church yesterday morning, four by profession and four by letters.

A resolution was passed by the church adopting individual communion cups. A committee consisting of Willis N. Buttricks, Charles B. Foote and G. H. Buttricks has been appointed to examine styles and prices of cups and to report to the church.

The evening service of this church is growing in favor, as shown by the large attendance.

The funeral of Frederick B. Catlin was attended yesterday afternoon by Rev. W. J. Mutch. There was a large attendance of sorrowing friends and beautiful floral tributes.

Miss Maude Leggett took the place of Mrs. A. B. Treat in the choir at the Howard avenue Congregational church yesterday.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE.

Of a Young Man in Wallingford.

Wallingford, Dec. 1.—Harry Carter, twenty-eight, a well known young man who formerly lived here, attempted suicide at an early hour this morning and is now in a critical condition. Carter has been ill in Buffalo, N. Y., for some time, and about a month ago returned to Wallingford, where he has since been staying at the home of his sister, Mrs. Waldo Cook on Constitution street. His mind has been affected, and between 3 and 4 o'clock this morning, taking advantage of the temporary absence of his sister, Carter arose, procured a razor and slashed his throat, nearly severing the windpipe and escaping the jugular vein by about a quarter of an inch. The wound was sewed up, but his life is despaired of. His friends have been watching him closely of late, and they thought they had removed all means of suicide.

Winthrop Castle.

Winthrop castle, No. 10, K. G. E., will work in the second degree this evening and the degree team of Rock Castle will decide which one of Winthrop's team is entitled to the pin offered as a prize by the grand castle.

The Ladies' Aid society of Humphrey street church hold a sale of fancy articles, and give an entertainment in the church parlor on Wednesday and Thursday evenings of this week.

The battle sword of Major Gen. John Sedgwick, who was killed at Spottsylvania May 19, 1864, is also deposited with this historical society.

The swords of Gen. Robert O. Tyler and of Commander George W. Rodgers of the United States navy are guarded by the same society. Commander Rodgers was killed in the attack on Fort Sumter August 17, 1863.
